

Background

Emma Pendleton Bradley Hospital, which opened in 1931, was the nation's first psychiatric hospital devoted exclusively to children and adolescents, and today remains the only such hospital in the region.

Created by the wills of George and Helen Bradley in memory of their daughter Emma, Bradley Hospital provides a continuum of inpatient, school, residential, partial, outpatient and special education services for infants through adolescents. A major teaching affiliate and research center of The Warren Alpert Medical School of Brown University, Bradley Hospital is world renowned for its expertise in child and adolescent psychiatry. There are Fellowships in child and adolescent psychiatry, combined residents in pediatrics, psychiatry, child psychiatry, and post-doctoral psychology residents and fellows that receive training in Bradley Hospital's programs every year.

In collaboration between Bradley Hospital and Hasbro Children's Hospital, the unique Medical Psychiatric Program is the only program in the region designed to provide family-based integrated care for young people struggling with psychiatric and medical illness at the same time. The unit, on the sixth floor of Hasbro Children's is composed of 16 beds, for patients ages 12 to 18.
